Customer Reviews

I'm giving up on this one about 20% in due to rampant stupidity on the part of the players. I have previous experience with this author and the last thing I expected from him is this silliness. Here's the setup. Another invulnerable enemy has attacked Earth wiping out all humans (billions) except for maybe 10,000 left on Earth living like rats fighting a sporadic and ineffective guerrilla war action. There are also 23,000 who escaped to another planet. Both segments of humanity are in infrequent contact through an mysterious mechanism. The question now is if humanity leaves the planet where the 23,000 exist to a new Earth-like planet where they can prosper in safety or do they continue the pointless harrying of the aliens who've taken over the Earth? So far the aliens have not found the 23,000 off Earth but gee, it's only a matter of time and then there will be no humans left. The good guys are the ones saying to stand and fight despite the humans never having won an engagement. These good guys include some old guy who is so senile that he urinates in his pants, can't recognize his son and thinks his wife, dead for fifty years, is still alive. This is the guy who all humanity should take direction from? Yes, if you go along with the book's ideas. Meanwhile we have a major theme of religiosity with all the characters constantly praying including one good guy identified as a probable messenger straight from God. A sort of Moses in a spaceship. We have the aliens who just killed billions of humans and are trying to wipe the rest out identified as God's creatures too. Sure, why not? Sorry.
